WEATHER SYNOPSIS BY REGION

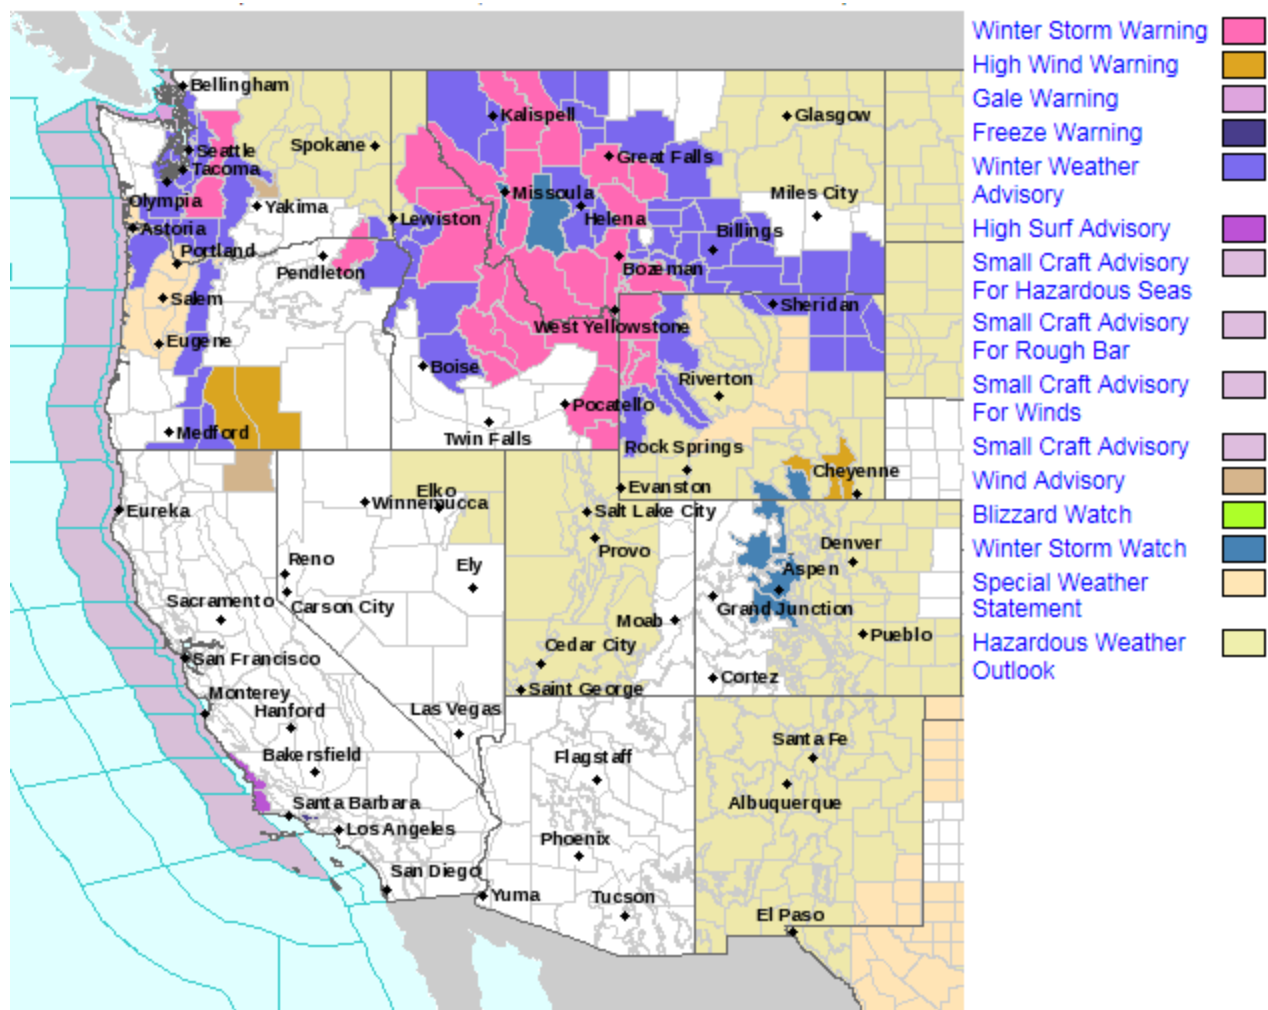

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA

A small upper level disturbance will bring chances for small amounts of rain and snow to the upper Valley and northern mountains today into Tuesday. Colder air in the Valley could result in near to below freezing overnight temperatures this coming week. Northwest flow aloft will bring in colder below normal high and low temperatures to the forecast area through mid week, which will range between 5 and 10 degrees colder than average. Confidence is increasing that temperatures Tuesday night into Wednesday morning will be near or below freezing, which could result in damage to crops and sensitive vegetation for locations near or below 32 degrees.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

Winds continue to lower this morning as surface pressure gradients rapidly weaken. Wind gusts are generally under 30 mph. The dry airmass in place along with lighter winds and clear skies have allowed temperatures to plummet in some of the valley locations. Meanwhile the mountains and high desert are significantly warmer with the lack of cold air advection from the north. Despite the chilly start, warmer weather is expected today with the continuation of offshore flow and a weak upper level ridge moving overhead. Highs across the region will be a few degrees above normal in the upper 60s to mid 70s in the coastal areas, valleys, and low deserts, and in the mid 50s to mid 60s in the mountains and high deserts.
